

European cities and the post-crisis context : social and policy innovations

International Workshop
30th November-1st December,
Cité Descartes, Champs-sur-Marne

The post-2008 global financial and economic crisis has impacted the economic, social, spatial and institutional dimensions of urban environments, with significant implications for the present and future quality of life in European cities. A macro view of the crisis is predominant in current debates, as well as an economic framing. Hence, an understanding of the mature responses at the city level in a comparative perspective is lacking.

The aim of this international workshop is to elaborate a common reflection on the future of EU cities by focusing on institutional innovation, via new tools and mechanisms for policy making which have been developed by cities in order to cope with the consequences of the crisis (new forms of inequality, housing shortage, gentrification and displacement, new difficulties for the delivery of public services...). Since the crisis, cities have not only been "the context" but also "collective actors" with particular strengths, weaknesses, and resources to deploy. Many responses have been formulated at the micro level, activating place-based and site-specific resources through forms of cooperation between city institutions and other stakeholders such as SMEs and business operators, third sector actors, or trade unions. These responses are obviously embedded in a much more long-term change in cities governance -at least since the neo-liberal turn of the 1980's- as well as in specific institutional and political contexts. Nevertheless, more recent austerity measures across Europe have resulted in cuts in public budgets, privatisation and downsizing of public services with the expectation that the private and the third sector can fill the gaps left by the withdrawal of the state. This context has strongly affected the capacity of both national and local authorities to implement public-led urban regeneration, to build housing for low-income people and to deal with environmental issues.

On this background, three research questions will be explored during the workshop:

- What have been the spatial consequences of the crisis on cities?
- How have cities coped with these consequences, in relation to institutional innovation via policy tools and mechanisms?
- To what extent new forces of governance, characterized by more cooperation, networking and partnering between various stakeholders have emerged?

These social and policy innovations at the city level will be explored through case studies from three main policy areas: urban effects of economic issues, housing and neighbourhood policies/environmental issues.
